Indigenous Women in the Fur Trade – Lynn Hanley

The use and often exploitation of indigenous women in the fur trade is well established as the HBC who originally frowned on relationships between their male employees at the fur trade posts and the local indigenous women but when it became apparent that those of particular lineage had value the relationships changed. John Mannall is a perfect example having been at Moose Factory for some 9 years before there was any record of children. There was no one to chose from and Moose Factory was already well established in the fur trade but being assigned to Frederick House took him to an opportunity to take on a "country wife" in a new community which in this case was Abitibi Algonquin and thus gain success in more fur trading and harvesting partners. Indeed on September 24, 1794 Chief of Moose Factory John Thomas wrote to John Mannall to say "The Hourable Board have agreed to your terms and appointed you to one of the Council" (HBC archives). This seems to indicate a recognition and award for his service and as time goes by we see him moved around and posted at various sites where he took his wife and daughters to work harvesting furs and fish. At the end of his HBC career he promptly left Canada, returned to England and took on a new wife named Cordelia Haxell. He left his "country wife" and 2 daughters in Moose Factory. These women were chattels and any love for them was likely just not there. They served a purpose which was to make inroads into the Abitibi Algonquin trade area. Indeed after the birth of his 2 daughters, some 2 years apart there is no record of any other children. At one point there were some indications that he had a son but no record has been found about that.

The account below from the Canadian Geographic clearly shows the history of the lot of these hard working but exploited indigenous women, Hannah and her mother and sister being 3 of them.

The untold story of the Hudson's Bay Company – Canadian Geographic – May 2, 2020

"According to one official, the presence of Indigenous women at HBC factories was "very prejudicial to the Companies affaires" because it gave HBC men a means of "debauching themselves," "embezzling our goods and very much exhausting our Provisions." In other words, it just wasn't what British gentlemen did, and it could cut into profits.

Enforcing the ban, however, proved difficult. Soon, local officers and governors, who were some of the first to "take" Indigenous wives, turned a blind eye when their employees did the same. With little control over what happened across the ocean, the company eventually relaxed its restrictions. Officials came to realize that forming kinship ties with Indigenous communities would boost men's morale and enhance business.

By the end of the 18th century, the practice of HBC employees marrying Indigenous women was widespread. Often, these unions were formed in what was known as the "custom of the country." Rather than strictly following European marriage customs, the relationships incorporated the woman's Indigenous culture. They were a unique product of fur trade society, a blend of European and Indigenous cultures and, in some cases, the beginnings of a distinct Métis culture.

Some HBC men, however, seemed to believe that because these relationships weren't solemnized with British rituals, they could abuse them. One of the most notorious examples of this was 19th-century governor George Simpson, who ruled Rupert's Land with an iron fist. Simpson was ruthless in his "taking" and treatment of Indigenous women. From 1820 to 1830, he fathered five children with four different women, whom he often passed off to someone else, sometimes with detailed instructions. "If you can dispose of the Lady it will be satisfactory as she is an unnecessary and expensive appendage," he wrote to one friend. "I see no fun in keeping a Woman, without enjoying her charms ... but if she is unmarketable I have no wish that she should be a general accommodation shop to all the young bucks at the Factory and in addition to her own chastity a padlock may be useful."

Other men demonstrated respect for their wives and families. Master canoeman William Flett ensured that upon his death, all his money went to "the sole use and benefit" of his "reputed wife, Saskatchewan." Van Kirk relates the story of a Cree woman known as "Pawpitch, Daughter to the Captain of the Goose Hunters," who fell ill in early 1771. Her husband, Humphrey Marten, recorded her passing at 2:50 a.m. on the morning of January 24. With her death, "my poor Child becomes Motherless," Marten mourned.

These women, whose names rarely appear in the written record, and whose feelings about their marriages are impossible to know, were critical in the HBC's development. Traders and officials relied on them to strengthen ties with male relatives who could provide furs and speak with trappers in Indigenous languages, not to mention cook, clean, care for their children and treat the furs they received.

Still, their labour was rarely rewarded by officials, whose attitudes toward Indigenous women became clear when their husband retired from the company or died. Until the early 19th century and the founding of Manitoba's Red River Colony, HBC policy banned its contract employees, called "servants," from settling in Rupert's Land after they stopped working for the company. As a result, most men returned to Britain. But the company also banned employees from taking Indigenous wives or children with them."

By the time Hannah reached age 12 and her sister Mary born 2 years later reached the same age they were put to work with their mother harvesting furs and fish. Here is a clear record of John Mannall's continual reference to them at those ages and then promptly in 1814 it was all over as he left them and returned to England. The following are passages from journals of the HBC. From December of 1803 he continually mentioned them in their harvesting work but never had the courtesy or kindness to even mention their names even though we know they were both recorded in the Moose Fort records of births and deaths written by his boss John Thomas, father of Charles who was husband to Hannah in later life.

Below: Excerpts from HBC Archives Journals showing the pattern of Mannall's wife and children as mere workers in the fur trade. It all ends in 1814 when he retires to England and leaves them. (See his Bio sheet)
